“Facts You Did Not Know About Me”: Rhetoric, Persuasion, and Speaking in Character
by Sarah Kortemeier, Library Specialist, The University of Arizona Poetry Center and
Sonja Fordham, Graduate Assistant in Teaching, Department of English, The University of Arizona

Grade Level: University
Time Frame: 50 minutes
Objective: Students will create a list of “little-known facts” that a fictional or non-fictional character might use as a persuasive strategy in the creation of a public argument.
Prior Knowledge and Skills: Students will need a basic understanding of rhetorical strategies, rhetorical situation, and rhetorical appeals to complete this lesson. This lesson is designed as an introductory activity for a unit on public argument or persuasion.
Required Materials: Recording of Roger Bonair-Agard, “the all-black penguin speaks: 17 facts you did not know about me”; computer with audio/video playback capability. Recording is available on voca, the Poetry Center’s online audio/video library.

Sequence of Activities

Introduction: 10 minutes
Give students a brief introduction to voca, the Poetry Center’s online audio/video library. Introduce the idea of “character” in poetry: poets often speak in terms of an “I,” which may or may not be autobiographical. Persona poetry, for example, usually functions as a dramatic monologue in the voice of a specific character, and slam and performance poetry also frequently incorporate defined characters.

Have students view Roger Bonair-Agard’s “the all-black penguin speaks: 17 facts you did not know about me” on voca.

Discussion: 10 minutes
Tell students that this poem frequently surprises viewers. Why is this? What does Bonair-Agard do in this poem to disrupt our expectations? How do these surprises help him to develop the penguin as a character in this poem?

Bonair-Agard uses this character to make some very specific points about the culture we live in. How would you characterize his argument and its rhetorical situation: what is his purpose, who is his audience, and what is the context? Why might the persona poem be useful in this rhetorical situation? What rhetorical strategies does Bonair-Agard use? In particular, why is the revelation of “facts you did not know about me” a powerful persuasive tool?

Split students into three groups. Play the poem again and have students listen for specific rhetorical appeals: Group 1 will focus on ethos, Group 2 on logos, and Group 3 on pathos.

Give students a few minutes to discuss their findings. Have students report to the group as a whole. How does Bonair-Agard deploy rhetorical appeals, and what effect do these appeals have on his audience?

Writing Activity: 20 minutes
Ask students to think of a character (fictional or non-fictional) who has a stake in a controversy. How (and to whom) might this person speak in order to make a public argument? Have students jot down the name of their character, the character’s audience, and a brief assessment of the tone the character might use given this audience and context.
Then have students write a list of 10 “facts you did not know about me” in the voice of this character. These facts should help to advance the character’s public argument; they should also be genuinely surprising to the character’s audience.

Closing: 10 minutes

Share student writing with the class.